Fascinating Ancient History Of Roman Shields | Ancient Pages
The scutum was a type of shield used among Italic peoples in antiquity, and then by the army of ancient Rome starting about the fourth century BC. The Romans adopted it when they switched from the military formation of the hoplite phalanx of the Greeks to the formation with maniples. In the former, the soldiers carried a round shield, which the Romans called a clipeus. In the latter, they used the scutum, which was a larger shield. Originally it was an oblong and convex shield. By the first cent

Scutum (shield) - Wikipedia
The Romans didn't build the biggest empire in Western history by sitting around in togas. Their tortoise formation employed the square Roman shield, or scutum, with great success. Soldiers would position their shields at their sides, while the first row would hold the shields in front of them, and the men in the middle would place their shields over their heads.
